

Innovation is increasing at an exponential pace. Going forward, economies not based on a foundation of high-tech entrepreneurship will fall behind. Ending the "brain drain" to Silicon Valley—and stimulating local startup ecosystems—are challenges both Canada and Latin America face.

This premier event brings together both the leaders of the Latin American ecosystems and their Canadian counterparts for two intense days of speakers, panels, and workshops. Investors, startups, and public policy officials from across the region will meet at LatAm Startups Conf 3.0, looking for ways to partner with Canada in the years ahead.

LATAM

STARTUPS CONFERENCE

3.0

MEXICO
OCTOBER
2016

“...So to those of you from Latin America, I encourage you to think of Canada when starting your businesses. And to Canadians, I urge you to turn your attention to Latin America, as there are so many untapped, potential partnerships to be found.

Let me leave you with my vision for Canada in the north and Latin American countries of Central and South America.

I hope that we can unlock our full capacity for invention, creativity and discovery that are the hallmarks of successful societies. And I hope that we do so by learning and working together.”

Governor General of Canada His Excellency David Johnston.

Testimonials

"The demographics in Latin America are better than anywhere," said John Ruffolo, CEO of venture capital firm OMERS Ventures in an interview. "Everyone is thinking about China but we are starting to think about [investing in] Latin America because of a similar time zone and culture."

"The growing grassroots ties between startup ecosystems in Canada and Latin America are mutually beneficial," said Victoria Lennox, CEO of Startup Canada. "Entrepreneurs in both regions need access to global markets, investors, and networks beyond their own borders to scale. We need to encourage our entrepreneurs to maintain their home base in Canada but test new markets outside of North America."

"It's time for the world to realize innovation doesn't just happen in Silicon Valley"
Marcus Dantus, CEO Startup Mexico
